

Your contract

Read it together, write in your numbers, and sign it by hand. That signature is what makes it stick.

Why a contract, and why now? Most people only change when it is already too late, after the heart scare, the bad diagnosis, the moment the doctor turns serious. You are doing it before that, while it is still a choice and not an emergency. That is exactly what this contract is for.

Put something on the line

A promise with nothing at stake is easy to break, so put something real on the line together: money you would hate to lose, or a trip or treat you both want. One rule, and it is what makes you a team: you only win if you both win, and if one of you quits, you both lose it. Now you are not just fighting your own cravings, you are carrying each other.

Our Commitment

We, Guillermo and Pilar, on this day _____, make this promise to ourselves and to each other. Truly and honestly, with our whole hearts, we commit to this challenge, because deep down we know we want this, and the weak voice in us is not the one steering the ship:

- We will be stronger than our cravings. A craving is just a wave, and we let it pass.
- We will not give in to our impulses. An impulse has no power. We are the captains of our ship.
- Our systems are stronger than our willpower, because we know our willpower will run dry, and our systems will not.
- We will eat below the calories our bodies truly need, most days, without starving ourselves.
- When the impulse hits, we stay strong, go to our habits, and read our why again.
- We will weigh ourselves regularly and write it down, to see the honest truth.

We make this commitment as a team, for _____ days (we choose 30 or 45), because changing a lifetime system is hard and deserves a real promise. We do it now, on purpose, before life forces us to.

What we put on the line, together:

Guillermo
