

It was never about the food

If you forget everything else in this guide, keep these two pages. It all comes down to a handful of truths, and a couple of laughs. Read them slowly, read them out loud, and come back to them on the hard days.

It was never about the food.

Of everything in here, this is the deepest part: it is not about food. Not rules, not another diet, not gritting your teeth at the dinner table. It is a deep shift in the way your mind works, and a change in the way you live. That is the foundation, and if you build on sand, no recipe on earth will hold. Get the mind right, and the food quietly takes care of itself. (And that famous line, that breakfast is the most important meal of the day? Never science. It was a cereal advert from the early 1900s, invented to sell more cornflakes.)

The magic is hiding in the hunger.

The magic you are looking for is in the very thing you keep running from: a little hunger. Your body runs on two fuels, the food you just ate and the fat you carry around. (The fat we all carry, Guillermo, not a personal attack, I have seen your arms.) Feed it every couple of hours and it stays lazy and never touches the reserves. Let a little normal hunger back in, and it remembers how to burn its own fat. Your ancestors did not roll out of the cave to a full plate, they hunted the mammoth on an empty stomach and ate after. That little hunger is not the enemy. It is the door.

You are the captain.

Right now, when a craving shows up, your body snaps its fingers and you obey. The body is steering the ship, and you, the captain, have quietly let go of the wheel. Take it back. A craving is just an impulse, it has no power of its own, and the only one with real power here is you. Win that one fight inside your head and you have not just beaten one craving, you have beaten all of them, and every single win literally rewires your brain.

Tell the cheesecake to go home.

Picture it: you are out at the Chinese restaurant you love, and a gorgeous little whisky cheesecake is sitting on the table, batting its eyes at you. You look it dead in the eye, you smile, and you tell it: "Vete a tu puta casa." Go home, you are not invited tonight. And when the bill comes and you never even ordered it, you sit back, grin, and think: I won, because I am stronger than you. That is exactly what being the captain feels like.

Systems beat willpower.

Willpower is a small bucket of water, and by the evening it is almost always empty, which is why plans built on willpower alone fall apart at ten at night on the sofa. The people who make it are not stronger than you, and it is not iron discipline. They simply built systems, so that when temptation shows up, willpower never has to save the day. You do not keep the biscuits out of your mouth, you keep them out of the house.

A craving is a wave, not a wall.

A craving feels like a wall you have to climb, but it is really a wave. It rises, it peaks, and if you do not feed it, it breaks and rolls away, usually in just a few minutes. You do not have to beat it. You just have to outlast it: drink a glass of water, make a tea, step outside, and let it pass. And remember, you cannot out-train a fork, not even up on the scaffolding, so the real work is here, in the small daily choices.

Feed the stronger you.

There is an old line, and it is true: the spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak. Inside you there is a stronger version and a weaker version of yourself, and both are completely real. Every time you keep your word to yourself, the strong one grows. Every time you break it, the weak one grows instead. Nothing you do is ever wasted, it is always feeding one of the two. So the only question that really matters is this: which one do you want to feed?

Stop doing the same thing.

"Insanity is doing the same thing over and over again and expecting a different result." That was Einstein, and before Pilar reaches for the frying pan, nobody here is calling anyone crazy, we have all done it. But a seed cannot stay a seed and become a tree at the same time. Something has to break open. So stand in front of the mirror, look yourself in the eye, and say it like you mean it: this is not how I want to feel, and I am going to change it. I brought my body here, so I can bring it back. Food does not control me. I am stronger than my impulses.

You do not have to be perfect. You just have to keep coming back. You are stronger than your impulses, so today, prove it to yourself one more time.

Would you rather listen? 🎧

Scan the code with your phone. Two ways to take it with you: listen to the whole guide right away in the player, or download all the audio onto your phone.